Intra-operative anterolateral thigh perforator flaps: review of 50 consecutive cases. The aim of this retrospective study was to present a broad review of the data on free flaps based on the anterolateral thigh (ALT) perforators and to highlight the experience in flap management. From 1995 to 2000, 75 free perforator flaps based on the ALT were performed. The ALT was the only perforator in 33 cases (44%), it was associated with the sural perforator in 40 cases (53.3%) and with the superficial peroneal in 2 cases (2.7%). The distribution of the flaps based on the 2 main branches of the perforators was as follows: 22 gastrocnemius muscle perforator-based flaps (56%), 9 soleus muscle perforator-based flaps (22.5%), 5 proximal and distal tibial muscle perforator-based flaps (12.5%), and 3 saphenous vein perforator-based flaps (7.5%). In 30 cases (60%), the anastomosis between the perforator and the recipient artery was a distally based anastomosis. In 20 cases (40%), the anastomosis was a proximal-based anastomosis and in 10 cases, it was an anastomosis between the ALT and the posterior tibial artery. The overall success rate was 90% (90/100) with 1 failure (1.25% of total) related to a distal tibial ALT-based flap. Review of the literature showed that among the 75 free ALT flaps performed over an 8-year period, 54% were a gastrocnemius muscle perforator based, 33% an ALT-sural perforator based, and 12% were a distal tibial perforator based. The overall success rate was 91% with 2 failures (3.3%) related to a deep ALT-sural perforator based flap, which was anastomosed to the distal popliteal artery.// Copyright (c) 2012 The Chrom 570a42141b
